Research Profile

I am a PhD candidate in political science and sociology specializing in the gendered dimensions of forced political displacement under conditions of war and authoritarianism. My research examines how emotions, political opportunity structures, and transnational repression shape the experiences, vulnerabilities, and civic engagement of politically displaced populations, with a particular focus on women migrants from post-2022 Russia. Methodologically, I combine large-scale panel surveys, experiments, and in-depth qualitative interviews to produce research with both academic and policy relevance for migration governance, protection frameworks, and gender justice initiatives.
